Brand New Book  Print on Demand .Excerpt from The Intellectual Torch, Vol. 3: Developing a Plan for the Universal Dissemination of Knowledge and Virtue by Means of Free Public Libraries One late forenoon in the winter of 1815, the 4th of December to be exact, a young man walked through the streets of Washington toward the place where Congress was about to assemble. Comely in appearance, still in his twenties, and brisk in his walk, his usually observant manner seemed a bit dulled by preoccupation. Perhaps his thoughts were of the Congressional session he was about to witness, a privilege which he had long coveted and anticipated. Possibly they were of the recent war with England, plain evidence of which lay ahead on his path down Pennsylvania Avenue, in the Capitol, burnt and ruined by the British the preceding year. Such is the egotism of young manhood, however, even amidst attractive and interesting surroundings, it is far more likely that he was considering again his favorite project, his new idea, to which he fondly desired to call the attention of Congressmen and Legislators....
